Passage 1

Bodke lives in a pocket-sized tenement with erratic water supply on TJ Road. Across the street are gated high-rises with their swimming pools and squash courts plotted across acres of land. “We live next-door to each other but don’t really cross paths,” says Ujwala Deshmukh, a few kholis away from Bodke. “This is our side and that is theirs.” With half the city living in slums, Mumbai has always been known for the cheek-by-jowl proximity of the rich and the poor. But in the past decade, as old textile mills in central Mumbai have given way to luxury high-rises and office towers, the social divide is visible in a new way. The rich are suddenly living in the midst of historically gritty neighborhoods—or floating above them as best they can. Nowhere is this juxtaposition—and disconnect—more glaring than on TJ Road in Sewri where posh complexes like Ashok Gardens, Celestia Spaces, and Dosti Flamingos have sprung up along a narrow lane lined with small shops and working-class tenements.

The disruption has forged a complex, sometimes prickly relationship between old and new residents. The high-rises have brought some benefits to an area blighted by shuttered mills. Many chawl residents have got work as maids and drivers. During festivals, aajis visit flats to whip up traditional delicacies like puran polis. But festival time is also when conflict erupts between tower and tenement. During Navratri and Ganeshotsav, the tower windows remain firmly shut. “The noise levels are very high,” says Tejas Parulekar, a Dosti Flamingos resident who moved in five years ago. Some wonder if chawl residents are extra noisy to annoy their new neighbours. “During a celebration, there will always be a few people from the buildings dialling 100 [the police],” Parulekar says.
